How is it possible to theorize not only on the so-called Global South, but also in, from, and through it? What appears as universal often involves a generalization that flattens and dominates the particular – predominantly from a Eurocentric perspective. This workshop will discuss ways to unsettle the very distinction between the general and the particular without discarding the claim to universality that makes theorization generative and relevant. Scholars from a variety of fields who undertake such inquiries are invited to jointly develop novel methods, approaches, and styles of knowledge production and circulation.
